Shoreham to restart with new tube in place

By DAVID J. KRAJICEK

Low-power testing at Long Island Lighting Co.'s Shoreham nuclear power plant is scheduled to resume today following a two-day interruption that began when a quarter-inch tube that carries air into a generator valve broke Saturday.

The part was replaced and testing could have resumed yesterday, said Carol Clawson, speaking for LILCO. But, she said, LILCO officials met yesterday morning and decided to take advantage of the shutdown by ordering maintenance work that would include equipment inspection. She said she could not be more specific about the maintenance.

"There is some maintenance work at any power plant that can only be done while it is shut down," Clawson said. "There is absolutely no cause for concern."

The tube break was the second malfunction at the $4.5 billion Long Island plant since testing began July 7.

Army is eying the private ($$)

Washington (UPI)—The Army, concerned about budget cutbacks that could squeeze out plans to create five light infantry divisions, plans to seek a private $400 million mortgage to build a base for one of the outfits in New York.

The move would set a precedent and an Army spokesman said that if the financing arrangement works, "I wouldn't be surprised if w seek more of this type of thing." Congress first must approve the financing plan.
